Additional information

Scientific activities:

The scientific activities of Prof. Alberto Amadori span a 40-year period, and have always centered on Immunology and Immunopathology issues. The leit-motif of his activity is the study of the mechanisms underlying alterations associated with immunodeficiency status, including their correlation with the neoplastic transformation process. Most recently he is exploiting his accumulated knowledge and expertise to explore the modern concept that tumors arise and grow in a strict interaction with the surrounding micro-environment, with special focus on angiogenesis, tumor dormancy, and the instruments to manipulate these phenomena.

These activities may be summarized in the following major research fields:

- 1) Studies on physiological and pathological aspects of immune function (1976-1984)
- 2) Study of the immunologic alterations associated with HIV infection, with special attention to B cell activation as a step favouring lymphoma development (1984-1997)
- 3) Study of the mechanisms underlying lymphoma development in an experimental model of human lymphomagenesis (1991 - present)
- 4) Immunotherapy and gene therapy approaches in experimental tumor models by retroviral and lentiviral vectors (1996- present)
- 5) Study of the interplay between tumors and their micro-environments, with special attention to the neo-angiogenesis process, cancer stem cells, and the pathways to interfere with this phenomenon (1999 - present)
